

These revisions are rather excellent after reviewing, some comments I may submit.

Even though it is American Government it can be beneficial for students to compare and contrast other forms of governments from different countries. For example the students compare the difference between the representative democracy in the United States to a parliamentary system in Britain. The students can see the pros and cons of each system and why such a system may or may not work in a place such as the United States.

I appreciate the importance of civility that has been put into these frameworks, it seems as though a lot of emphasis has been placed on making students prepared to more informed voters, who care about the world they are about to go into.

The section of Fundamental Civil Society:

In this section it could be beneficial to talk about some important laws that students should know to protect them that have to do with their civil liberties. For example knowing how to deal with being pulled over, do students know their rights, for search and seizures. It sounds simple but these are everyday occurrences that students need to be prepared for.

There was great information included in the congressional portion. It would be great to include things such as pay scales for something in Congress vs someone such as a lobbyist. Let students really know where tax dollars are going within the government.

Students should have a break down of financials in general not just in economics but in government as well. Pay scales, budgets, allocations, where money goes, because it ultimately will influence how they vote, or ideally it should.

I also really appreciated the diversity in the Supreme Court Cases that were represented to examine the evolution of civil rights. I think it included a multitude of different cases that represented the United States well. If at all possible I would try and add even more recent cases just as a way get students more interested and feeling more connected. If students feel like they can relate to a situation they generally pay more attention, and want to learn about the material.

Thank you for continuing to work on our education system, I look forward to seeing the future of our Framework,

Best Regards,
Sara Karimi-Hosseini